

UK.org.

Member Comment:

15 April 2005

TO BE OR NOT TO BE, THAT IS THE CONSTITUTION:

After studying the history of the NCGUB™s/NCUB™s portfolio, policy making, it would appear, is not part of their criteria, therefore, these groups should not be viewed as political parties, as this is not the role they were created for, and to appear as such, is to deceive the people, and more importantly, will confuse their understanding of a democracy? More absurdly, these people decided among themselves, that a new constitution is required stating that the 1948 constitution, is, from my understanding of their declaration, (published as an interview by the "New Era Journal"™, who is also closely linked to these two factions) is unconstitutional, in that, the rights of the ethnic groups is not sufficient. This is surely a brazen act of idiocy and is nothing more than a bunch of dreamers sitting on a dark cloud, who desperately crave for recognition, lest they sink into oblivion brought about by their inadequate and irresponsible failures in finding a solution to bring down the military regime, but instead, placed a bigger emphasis on self promotion and financial security! One would think that all the academic qualities these people are so fond of boasting, even though is mostly only on paper and never practised, would know how to conduct themselves when the eyes of the world are upon them, where they portray themselves unashamedly as Burma™s saviour, a world they want to become part of, although, most of them are already and doing very well thank you very much!

I visited the web pages of both said groups, and amazingly, but not surprisingly, pages which would presumably show committee members were still under construction. How long have these groups been formed, and how much money have they foolishly been given, that they wont even inform the people who sits at its table?

If one was to visit the PDP webpage <http://www.pdpburma.net> they will find all relevant information which they regard as a people™s right, but then, the PDP is historically Burma™s only main stream political party, with the NLD, joining its ranks much later by both having won an election, even though both mandates are now invalid and would have to be decided by new elections. However, alteration in any form, to the constitution, or failure to recognise its existence, would be an act of dire consequence; it would be an interesting legal scenario if taken to the UN for example?

A constitution is not something of which is cast aside haphazardly, and replaced. Once a constitution is set into the foundations of a democratic society, founded on free elections, it cannot simply be discarded like yesterdays newspaper, however, like yesterdays news, it can be updated and amended to meet with the times, but this cannot simply be done by a few individuals who consider themselves legally positioned to do so!

Let the people judge whether or not the constitution needs replacing, or simply requires a minor amendment, which even then, can only really be adjusted once a government is in place, and not by a group self important individuals, no matter how much academic bullshit they try to baffle others with.

(http://www.shanland.org/History/Publications/consittution\_of\_the\_union\_of\_bur.htm)

The NCGUB and its principle agent, the NCUB, are intrinsically linked and therefore cannot be regarded as separate entities, nor, should either be heard as the voice of the 1990 electorate, as only a few members hold that privilege, and they, are influenced from a very different quarter? These two groups posing as political platforms are not the elected voice of the NLD, but individuals who manipulate the few who are, allowing an air of legality and standing, but in truth, are power seekers treading their own path, whose aim is to steal power for themselves by delaying the process of further elections long enough, for them to further their own ends and to secure themselves financially? What they should do; is to retain the platform as lobbyists and to act as the viewing window into Burma's problems, revealing it to the world.

To some, the NCUB, is the link to the ethnics, and other groups, and was formed to act as an umbrella enabling one voice to speak for all, yet the NCUB gives out images of it being a political party in its own right, as does the NCGUB, which of course, they are not!

If the regime were to step down, and allow elections, both these two groups would have to disband because the job they were created to perform would come to an end, and each individual would return to the fold on their original nest.

The NCUB:

Quote taken from "Aims of NCUB"; "To establish a Federal Union under which equality among all ethnic groups is guaranteed". Un-quote.

The very nature of that statement insinuates that the ethnic nations can only survive under a Federal system, and gives the impression that a federal Union is beneficial to their future? A UK, org member suggested some time back, that the ethnics would fair much better if they were to first unite themselves, and then assist in overthrowing the regime, implanting a interim government in Rangoon, call an election within an appropriate time period, secure democracy, create a working economy, a stable currency, along with all the other necessities, then, after a period of stability, debate can take place on the future of ethnic wishes.

Having experienced difficulties in ethnic unification in the past, how, does rewriting a new constitution, emphasizing in big letters, that under a federal system the ethnic groups will be promised more autonomic powers, somehow indicate, that decades, if not centuries of antagonism between ethnic groups, which has allowed the military regime to divide and rule, suddenly turn into brotherly love??

Just out of curiosity, will this planned federal system also operate within Burman territory, meaning, that the area concerned will be split into numerous states, each with its own self governing body, or, will it only be the ethnic states which stand out side of the circle?

As I understand it now, according to the NCGUB & Co, the route is; to rewrite a new constitution, where all the ethnic groups will jump with joy and the regime will lay down their arms in fear of it? Really! Do these people never tire of being humiliated by the SPDC, and worse, why do they drag others into the pit of humiliation along with them? This final desperate act in the attempt to look important to the people is by far the most ludicrous, and many of the world's institutions will be wondering just what exactly, the ambition is?

Mark

A UK.org. Member