"To support the NLD and ASSK, is to be a member of an exclusive club outside of Burma, the politics of which, has long been abandoned, as have the people of Burma, for a more lucrative lifestyle, which in truth, is really what these people are defending"?

Many of those exiles who have never lifted a finger against the SPDC are today living off the celebrity of ASSK, and defend her non-violence so that their secure lifestyles, far from danger, can appear legitimate, and not seen as cowardice?

We add to that; SPDC members at home and abroad belong to their exclusive club also. In both cases, the welfare of the population is not always in their interest, if it were; those who preach democracy under ASSK, would flock back into the jungles to put their lives on the line for freedom for the country they are supposed to love so much, or, support those genuine revolutionaries with a donation from their freedom from conviction money, instead of using this ladies policy of non-violence as their convenient excuse to promote their own life styles, by grossly undeservingly, seeking ovations for their deceptive back room stance, against the SPDC?

On the other side; there are those within the ranks of the higher echelons of the SPDC, who also secretly reveal their desire to stand with the people, but are torn, between the lavish life styles they are accustomed to, compared to what could become a poverty trap, or death, if they cross over?

There are of course many factors dictating Burma's direction, and there is no easy solution, however; there is always a solution!

Over the years, we have found, un-surprisingly we might add, that many of Burma's older exiles, are totally ignorant of Burma's history from post WW2 when it comes to; who, what, where, and how, simply because; they were not part of it, just as many in Britain were and are, ignorant of what went on within the inner circles of power during WW2 and conflicts involving the UK up to the present day, quite simply, because they were not part of it! Many of Burma's exiles, pick up on what may be seen as major events over the years in Burma and catalogued in the press of the free world, making it easy to research. The young of course are too young to have lived it therefore can never be in a position to talk on the subject, and are therefore; easily misled by those determined to deceive! Many, who escaped into exile, only succeeded because they may have lived a middle class existence or higher, the less fortunate, would never have that opportunity because of their lack of information on the outside world, so would not know where to begin. To these suffering people they look to the confines of the jungle to hide from terror.

Many exiles play the part of escaped fighters, with tales of heroism and daring, but a person only has to talk to those who fought in the jungle for years, and are still fighting, old and young, and UKorg members visit them regularly, to know the truth, that in turn, makes them very angry with the fairy tales told by some exiles, as did many of ethnic senior figures all of whom, have been swimming in the blood of their people since 1962 without any grace or favour from those who preach patriotism but whom fail to project it into any practical and meaningful action!

We hold nothing but contempt to those people!

Going back to the Nelson Mandela profile which many still insist is on par with ASSK.

One of Mr Mandela's, (whom I greatly respect) first statements made on his release from prison, was to honour an ANC member for his contribution and loyalty to the cause. The person was none other than; Joe Slovo, anti-Apartheid activist, born in Lithuania and white, was one of the founders of Umkhonto we Sizwe (MK), the armed wing of the ANC. It was this man who convinced the ANC and Mandela that armed aggression was the only way to inflict the seriousness of the ANC's dedication to ending apartheid and the terror tactics targeted at the coloureds that went with it. After decades of being in prison, the applied tactics used against the Sth. African government of the day, was still as firmly accepted by Nelson Mandela as it was on the day he was arrested.

This conviction to the cause is a far cry from Suu Kyi's passive stance, which will never succeed whereas, the ANC did?

The truth always hurts!

Football today, could be described as a classic example of misplaced loyalties and displays a lack of full understanding and acceptance of honouring sportsmanship by those who support opposing teams.

As with the NLD, and ASSK, criticism of either, is instantly attacked by those who consider themselves as loyal supporters, displaying all the signs of a delusion, totally indoctrinated by celebrity, believing they can do no wrong. To even listen, let alone consider, the views of others, is sacrilege?

To support the NLD and ASSK, is to be a member of an exclusive club outside of Burma, the politics of which, has long been abandoned, as have the people of Burma for a more lucrative lifestyle, which in truth, is really what these people are defending?
